She was the national political correspondent for the Washington Post and worked for NBC News, before moving to WTOP in 2009. Welcome to the show, Caroline. CAROLINE KNAAPP: Hi. Thanks so much for having me. CONAN: And as you might expect, I think Caroline is going to be good on the White House beat here. It's not a vast subject, but it is something that everyone in the country will be reading about as the presidential campaign moves forward. KNAAPP: I'll let you be the judge of that. CONAN: OK. So she's worked as a reporter covering politics and politicians. What a novel experience to take a leap into radio? KNAAPP: I was told that this would be a fun job. I don't actually know about that. But I do hope that it will be a fun and interesting beat to cover. CONAN: So you'll be covering the White House. You're a citizen reporter. KNAAPP: Citizen reporter. CONAN: You'll be just like the citizen. KNAAPP: Citizen journalists, citizen journalists, that sort of thing. CONAN: Citizen journalists, actually, is what this is called, you know. KNAAPP: That's right. CONAN: I'm glad you said citizen journalists because people can make a little bit of money, or make some money, doing this. d0c515b9f4
