Layer-by-layer self-assembly of metal nanoparticles with a blocked poly(acrylic acid) layer for photothermal therapy. The layer-by-layer self-assembly technique was used to prepare nanocomposites containing metal nanoparticles (MNPs) and a poly(acrylic acid) (PAA) layer. The polyelectrolyte (PE) layer was synthesized by cross-linking poly(acrylic acid) with the cross-linking agent 4,4'-oxydianiline (ODA), which had both photo-responsive and biocompatible properties. Both zeta potential and X-ray diffraction analysis showed the PAA layer had a negative charge and a high crystalline structure. When sodium oleate was used as the core, the coated MNPs, with a diameter of 10 nm, were negatively charged and the hydrodynamic diameter of the nanocomposite was 35 nm. The PAA layer could be cross-linked by UV light, and the color of PAA cross-linked with ODA was white. Zeta potential measurements indicated that the strong electrostatic force between metal MNPs and PAA-ODA cross-linked polyelectrolyte made the assembly stable. The PAA-ODA layer also had high biocompatibility, which could be degraded by treatment with plasmin to form hyaluronic acid. These results are helpful for applying the technique for drug delivery and providing a candidate for photothermal therapy.
