The footprints were made by a 1.8 million-year-old hominid, the oldest of whom ever discovered, named Ardipithecus ramidus. The picture is a new reconstruction of the type of ichnography it is likely to have made. It was thought the skeleton it inhabited was approximately 2 million years old – actually only two million years older than the oldest known hominid to date. But the finding will be contested by other scientists who claim that the species has been mis-dated. "We have found the oldest known footprints in the world," said Dr Liujie Liu, of the University of Beijing in China, one of a group of seven scientists from Europe and the United States who found the tracks. "They are not the oldest footprints in the world, but they are indisputably the oldest footprints made by a member of the genus Homo." The footprints appear to have been found in the Ethiopian highlands where archeologists have been excavating other evidence of the first emergence of Homo, the genus that contains both Homo habilis and Homo sapiens. The most famous of the earliest hominid remains have been found in East Africa, notably in Ethiopia, Tanzania and Kenya. The oldest and most famous 6d1f23a050
