I've been a bad writer lately. The pain of writing is one of my most primal and complex (and pleasurable) experiences. To share that, these past two weeks have been very hard. The writing goal Writing was the way I became a better cartographer. Learning the names of the spatial conditions, the way the wind blows, the ebb and flow of water, became critical to understanding the world around me. Writing, too, has always been a form of meditation. I learn to process my experiences, discover my hidden anxieties and hope, by filling those gaps in my memory with the language and images I construct and cultivate. I don't have any of that. During the past two weeks, I didn't do enough to facilitate this internal process. I've been so busy with work that I never had time to sit and reflect, which means I didn't write, either. It's been part of my daily routine since I was 14 years old, when I had my very first latte. Now, I drink at least 4 cups a day. Depending on what I'm doing, I consume another 2-4 cups at lunch and dinner. I drink tea and I drink alcohol. And, to be honest, I'm tired of the caffeine. It keeps me up at night and makes me anxious during the day. Trying to keep up with everything at work In the past six months, I've begun doing the work differently. For the past six months, in addition to cartography and data visualisation (where I've been working) I've also been working on two different business ventures. While on the road, I've been reading and writing as much as possible. Although I
