Select the right menu option, click the tool you want, and the program does the rest. Many of Photoshop's features are highly customizable. For example, you can click on any tool to customize how it works. You can also adjust things like brush, gradient and opacity. When you use standard shortcuts, you can repeat them easily and use different colors for similar tasks. Shopping for or editing your design will probably be done most often in Photoshop Elements, Photoshop's most accessible editing program. So, if you're just learning Photoshop, let's have a look at some basic editing skills you can use to improve your designs. Images One of Photoshop's most basic features is to give you tools to help you create an image. You can create new images using the Photoshop editing tools on the right of the default file window. With the basic tools, you can edit text, draw, make selections, add and move and many other things. Choosing images to use in your design is a critical step. Take a look at some basic guidelines that will help you choose the best ones for your design: Read the most important information in the image and the format in which it is presented. If possible, also look at the text. Sometimes screenshots of the form or any textual copy gives you a good idea of how the images are arranged. If possible, use an image that's optimized for smaller screens and use a pixel-doubling device if you can get it to work with the image. Check out the links below for more details and advice about images and how to optimize them so they're seen properly and at their best in any design you make. How to Create a Great Portfolio Using Photoshop How do you use Photoshop? Whether you need to design a logo, edit some photographs, or just design a brochure, the following basic tools will help you design a professional-quality image. Matrix metalloproteinases (MMPs) are endopeptidases of the lysosome-like M2 metalloproteinase class of the metzincin superfamily of metalloproteases (Friedl and Rankin, 1998, pages 271-310 in: The Matrix Metalloproteinases, edited by Larsen et al., Int. Press, Somerville, Mass.). The MMPs include several human enzymes of special medical importance. These MMPs are capable of breaking down all components of the extracellular matrix, i.e., the basal membrane, the cartilage matrix, and the bone structure itself. MMPs are believed to be involved in the growth and spread of cancer, tissue ulceration, periodontal disease, corneal graft rejection, and loosening of artificial joints. The MMPs are also involved in the pathological destruction of brains in conditions such as multiple sclerosis and neurodegenerative disorders. Other major pathological conditions associated with MMP activity are cardiovascular disease and the restenosis of coronary arteries following angioplasty. The MMPs can be classified according to their primary structure, substrate specificity, cellular distribution, and tissue distribution. The MMPs are endopeptidases, which are capable of breaking down components of the extracellular matrix or modulating other proteases, such as tissue inhibitors of metalloproteinases (TIMPs). TIMPs modulate the activity of the MMPs through two mechanisms. First, TIMPs bind to the catalytic zinc ion at the active site of the MMP. Second, binding of the TIMP prevents the MMP from breaking down its substrate(s). The catalytic zinc ion of the MMP is the focal point for the involvement of the MMPs in pathological processes. The zinc ion enhances catalytic activity by approximately 100-fold and binds to substrates and inhibitors. The principal MMPs identified thus far are stromelysin-1 (MMP3), stromelysin-2 (MMP10), stromelysin-3 (MMP11), matrilysin (MMP7), collagenase-1 (MMP1), collagenase-2 (MMP8), gelatinase A (MMP2), gelatinase B (MMP9), and membrane-type MMP (MMP14). MMPs have been described as secreted, zinc-containing metalloproteases
