Melanoma of the head and neck is a rare disease in Western countries. In France, with an incidence of 0.48 cases per 100,000 person-years, it represents the fourth most common type of cutaneous malignancy, after basal-cell carcinoma, squamous-cell carcinoma and Kaposi's sarcoma. Its prognosis is in general good but is closely related to the tumour thickness and location. In our department, from December 1998 to March 2008, we treated twenty-nine patients with melanoma of the head and neck. All patients had melanoma involving the lower lip, upper lip, buccal mucosa, gingiva or floor of the mouth. The upper-lip lesion was removed in all cases. Nine patients also received sentinel lymph node biopsy. The sentinel lymph node was identified in all cases. The median follow-up period was thirty-five months (range: 5-189 months). The three-year disease-specific survival was 100%. These results are similar to published reports. They suggest that sentinel lymph node biopsy may be an optional initial staging procedure. Surgery remains the most commonly used primary treatment. In our experience, complete tumour resection seemed to yield a better survival, especially for thick lesions (T3-T4).Q: String from Excel into access - Control from Access textbox result in null I'm trying to import a string from an Excel into an Access database.
