Instrumental methods for urinary myoglobin measurement and their interest in sports medicine. Myoglobinuria is a common, but underdiagnosed, and potentially life-threatening condition observed after acute rhabdomyolysis. Sports-related exertion, alcohol or drug consumption, or blunt trauma may trigger it. While most cases of myoglobinuria are diagnosed on clinical grounds, urinary myoglobin measurement is useful for determining the diagnosis and follow-up of patients with myoglobinuria. Myoglobin detection in urine has been widely used as a biomarker of myocardial infarction and renal injury. Moreover, the measurement of urinary myoglobin is a useful diagnostic adjunct in patients with deep venous thrombosis and uro-nefrological disorders. This article reviews the current literature on the use of urinary myoglobin measurement in determining the diagnosis of myoglobinuria. The paper also highlights the limitations of this diagnostic tool, which are related to its variability across and within laboratories and the lack of a standardized cut-off value. Finally, we discuss the interest of myoglobin measurement in sports medicine and in civil emergency medicine. Ultrastructural histological and immunocytochemical studies on hyaluronate in the placenta of the Indian tree shrew Tupaia glis, (Didelphinidae: Primates). Hyaluronate (HA) was studied in the placenta of tree shrews. Briefly, the fetuses were perfused through the heart with Glutaraldehyde and the tissues were rapidly dissected. Post mortem, the chorionic villi were studied histologically and immunocytochemically. We observed an epitheliochorial type placenta with a simple endometrial basal lamina on the perimetrium. The villous capillaries were relatively few. The only immunostaining of HA was seen along the ch 6d1f23a050
